Introduction

It was Buddy, an 18 month old German shepherd, who had contacted 911.

Pennsylvania was besieged by a rodent epidemic so large that they had to import cats!

If a student read either one of these statements out of context, the student might have a difficult time knowing which statement is fiction and which one is nonfiction. In addition, the student would have no idea how the two statements could be tied together or used to support an argument or idea.

If, on the other hand, the student read these statements in context and understood how they fit into an entire passage, the student would be able to answer with confidence that, as strange as it may seem, a man who suffered from massive seizures had trained his assistance dog to press programmed telephone buttons until a 911 operator came on line and responded. The student would then be able to compare, contrast, or tie this fact to a fictitious passage where one character uses historical facts to prove that domesticated cats are overlooked American heroes. (Both passages deal with helpful domestic animals.)

An Even Trade for Style

With exasperation, Katrina said, “I wish I had a magic wand. I’d wave it over my head so my hair would look desirable, fashionable, and stylish. I’ve spent uncomfortable hours highlighting and curling, and all for something that will last only a day.”

Odessa, Katrina’s friend and schoolmate, said, “There’s a history connection between wands and hair.”

As Han-Ling, another of Katrina’s friend’s, carefully tied up her hair, she asked, “How can there be a historical connection between wands and hair?”

Odessa explained, “During the latter part of the 1700s, French women styled their hair in high, towering headdresses that took hours to style and cost a lot but lasted for weeks.”

“Sounds like an even trade,” Katrina commented while continuing to primp.

“Not so fast,” answered Odessa. “To keep one’s hair from harm, one had to duck under doorways and sleep sitting up. Did you know that during that time, carriages had to be made with higher roofs?”

Laughing, Han-Ling queried, “But where do the wands come in?”

“Oh,” Odessa explained, “the headdresses were constructed with wire frames, cotton padding, and switches of horsehair. They were coated with sticky cream, powdered with starch, and decorated with jewels and feathers. Vermin, including lice, bugs, and sometimes even mice, would take up residence in the women’s hair. The women carried wands so they could slide the wands into their hair and scratch their heads without disturbing their headdresses.”

As Katrina and Han-Ling burst out with cries of repulsion and disgust, they put down their brushes, barrettes, and curling and straightening irons and made their way to the door.

“Careful,” warned Odessa. “We don’t want to jostle each other or go too fast. With our platform shoes and high heels it would be all too easy to fall and break an ankle.”
